

115946 - Can the mosque's money be given to repair the imam's house?

---

the question

Is it permissible to give the imam of the mosque some of the money that comes to the mosque, knowing that there is a committee which is responsible for this money? Is the imam regarded as one of the necessities of the mosque, knowing that he receives a salary from the waqf, but it is not sufficient for him, and this money that will be given to him is for the purpose of fixing the lights of his house which is in the mosque building, fixing the walls of his house and so on?

Detailed answer

Praise be to Allah.

Firstly:

If the money that is coming to the mosque is zakaah or sadaqah (charity) and the imam is one of those who are entitled to receive zakaah or sadaqah, then it is permissible to give it to him just like anyone else who is entitled to it.

Secondly:

If the money is given as a waqf for the mosque, or it is donated to the mosque, then it is to be disposed of according to the conditions stipulated by the donor. If he intended that it should be for the mosque in general and anything connected to it, such as the houses of the imam and muezzin, it may be spent on what they need of repairs.

But if he intended that it was to be limited to the mosque itself, then it should be spent on the mosque only, but if there is money surplus to the requirements of the mosque and the imam is in need, it is permissible to give some of it to him.

Shaykh al-Islam Ibn Taymiyah (may Allaah have mercy on him) said: It is permissible to give to the imam and muezzin from the surplus income of the waqf the payment that is usually given to such people; indeed, if they are poor and nothing has been specified about how to spend any surplus funds, then it is permissible to give it to them to ensure that they can make ends meet.

And he said: Hence the correct opinion with regard to waqfs is this opinion, and he may be given anything that is surplus to clothe him, as 'Umar ibn al-Khattaab used to give the covering of the Ka'bah in charity every year, dividing it among the pilgrims.

If that is the case, then it is well known that giving the surplus to the imam and the muezzin, if they are entitled to it, is better than giving it to anyone else, and even if the donor specified how the money is to be spent, the surplus may be spent on something other than what was specified by the donor, or it may be spent on a mosque other than this mosque.

End quote from Majmoo' al-Fataawa, 31/17

And Allaah knows best.