

298243 - Ruling on a pharmacist giving medicine covered by medical insurance to a patient even though he thinks it most likely that it is more than he needs and that he is going to sell some of it

the question

I am a pharmacist; I work in a pharmacy that dispenses medicine covered by medical insurance to patients. There is a patient who takes medicine every month that costs 3000, which is charged to the insurance account. Please note that he does not need this medicine, and it is most likely that he sells some of it for half the price to other pharmacies. Is there any sin on me if I dispense this medicine to him, noting that the insurance company does not have any problem with it, and the patient can get this medicine from pharmacies other than mine? Is it the patient's right to have all this medicine, and is it permissible for him to dispose of it by selling some of it or giving it to one of his relatives who is poor?

Detailed answer

Firstly:

With regard to identifying what medicine the patient needs and how much, reference should be made to the doctor who is treating him, not to the pharmacist.

Based on that, there is nothing wrong with the pharmacist dispensing medicine covered by medical insurance to the patient, even if he thinks it most likely that it is more than he needs. In that case, the sin is on him [the patient] and on the doctor who prescribed the medicine for him, if he prescribed something that the patient does not need, because of what that involves of lying and consuming the insurance money unlawfully.

The pharmacist does not have the right to dispense anything to the patient except what has been prescribed for him, such as if he wants to exchange some of the medicine for other things, such as cleansing materials or cosmetics, because he is entrusted to dispense what is in the doctor's prescription, and because of what that involves of lying to the insurance company by recording medicine that the patient did not receive; rather he received something else.

Secondly:

If the patient takes the medicine that the doctor has prescribed for him and that he actually needs, then it becomes his property and it is permissible for him to give it to someone else, on condition that that will not lead to him asking for more than he needs.

But if he takes it by way of trickery or lying, then it is unlawful wealth that does not become his property, and it comes under the same ruling as wealth that is seized by force or stolen; he must return it to the insurance company, or return a substitute or its value, because the Prophet (blessings and peace of Allah be upon him) said: "The hand that takes is responsible until it pays it back." Narrated by Ahmad (20098), Abu Dawood (3561), at-Tirmidhi (1266) and Ibn Maajah (2400). Shu'ayb al-Arna'oot said in Tahqeeq al-Musnad: It is hasan because of corroborating evidence.

And Allah knows best.
